

Changing Role of Women

Traditionalist groups also started to worry -> that Japan was losing its identity.

One common complaint -> was that young women -> were abandoning their traditional roles in their families.

During 1920s -> many young women found jobs cafes and restaurants in the cities.

others -> worked in Japans expanding silk mills and factories

Conditions -> were hard but wages were reasonable.

-> many young women -> found greater independence than before.

some -> also became more active in politics.

this was seen by some as a threat to traditional Japanese society and values.

-> these women were accused of serving their own interests instead of the needs of their families.\
