

Discontent from the Military throughout 1920s - there was a growing feeling - among number of officers in sections of Japanese military - that political parties and zaibatsu were corrupt and self seeking.

- they believed -> that politicians and zaibatsu -> were not interested in serving Japan but themselves.
 - many of these officers -> were young and came from families of the poorer rural farming communities + new urban middle classes.
 - both classes -> had been badly affected by economic conditions in 1920s.
 - they generally felt that civilian govt no longer respected the military in Japan -> because of cuts in military budgets.
 - seemed like political parties favored zaibatsu rather than military.
-