

London Naval Conference, 1930

navy -> was also discontented -> with civilian government.

1922 -> Japan had signed agreements with Britain, France, and US -> at the Washington naval conference to limit the total number of warships being built.

Compared to western powers -> number of warships Japan could have -> was fewer

- Military felt that civilian leaders had let them down by agreeing to the unfavorable terms of disarmament.

Countries met again at London Naval Conference in 1930 -> to review the treaty and limits on building warships.

at the conference -> Japan's demands to build more warships were rejected by western powers.

Japan -> forced to back down and sign the London Naval Treaty of 1930.

- Several ministers in the cabinet -> refused to agree to terms of the treaty and were removed from their positions.
- Government reluctantly signed treaty as it knew country was not ready to confront western powers.

In Japan:

- London Naval treaty of 1930 -> presented in press and by navy commanders as a form of betrayal by govt.
 - further undermined the people's trust in the democratic government.
